U+20B2, á, is a codepoint, and U+0301, is a combining class. You can also type it as á. Digital communications signal transceivers are used for a variety of applications including, for example, cellular telephones, pagers, cordless telephones, and satellite communication systems. The reduction of device cost is an important consideration in the design of these communication devices. This has become more so as products incorporating these devices become more portable and less expensive. The various circuitry required to provide the functionality of a digital communications device has become more complex as it is integrated on smaller and smaller chips. In addition, power supplies have become more efficient yet the signals within the device become more powerful. Consequently, the signals delivered to a circuit are more susceptible to interference, and the required level of isolation of the input and output signals has become more stringent. One component for which high isolation is required is the variable gain amplifier (VGA) of an automatic gain control (AGC) circuit. FIG 3da54e8ca3
