In Unity, I'm trying to make a simple prefab game object that can be quickly and easily placed onto the screen. What would be the correct name for it? Should it be a prefab item instead of a prefab game object? Should it be a prefab project instead of a prefab? Is there a more correct term out there? A: You could call it a prefab or a prefab project. A prefab would be more generic and could refer to a GameObject in general, while a prefab project is specific for Unity and refers to an asset that will be generated by the Unity Editor. So, my answer to your question would be: The correct term is prefab. Q: Is there a way to make ggplot2 add a zero at the end of integers? Professional Crack.dbForge Software Support DepartmentQ: What's the most effective method to throttle IO calls to a large volume of users? I'm a fan of request-based server-side throttling methods like HMAC tokens. What I'm trying to find is: What's a good way to deal with the large volume of calls I'll get for certain processes? What is a good way to deal with the large number of IPs that will be involved? I'm not asking for a complete solution, just some thoughts and directions that might be useful. So, for example, I should create a unique HMAC token for each IP and use it as a key in a fast hash function with a large block size? A: First of all, the volume of calls is not an issue. I'm talking about general web crawling. Sure, you've got a big number of IPs and a large number of requests. But your volume is still not a problem. The problem are the concurrent requests. So, the first thing you'll have to think about is the architecture. If you are an ASP.NET/ASP.NET MVC person, you'll have to use HttpModules. HttpModules allows you to intercept the incoming requests, and check the authentication token of the user. If the token is not valid, you will send back a 401 response to the browser, and the browser will then request a new token, which will be sent by the browser to your system. If you use a framework such as Ruby on Rails, there are quite a lot of solutions. Rack allows to intercept the incoming requests, and execute code for each request. This approach is typically called middleware. Another alternative is to implement your own dispatcher, which will check all the incoming requests. If the request is valid, it will just pass it on to the next method. Otherwise, it will send back a response with a HTTP status code such as 401, and then the browser will request a new token. A third approach is to consider the information you are actually accessing. The user is not accessing the database, so why do you need to check the database? All you are doing is keeping a user profile. In that case, you can use a cookie (a HTTP-only cookie, a client side cookie, or a persistent cookie). If you have an ASP.NET MVC application, you can check the cookie in
