White Rock (California) White Rock, a ghost town located in northern San Mateo County, is now found near U.S. Route 101 near San Bruno Mountain. History During the Spanish era, the territory now known as San Mateo County had been divided into two vast territories. The northern territory was governed by a priest, Father Juan Crespi, who administered a country with a land area of and a population of about 5,000. The southern territory was governed by Father Tomás Crespi who administered a country of with a population of about 3,000. Both priests were parishioners of the Diocese of Monterey. In the year 1768, the Diocese was instructed to build a parish and a convent for the priests. Father Crespi had many difficulties in finding a site for a permanent home until he selected a site upon which he built the foundation of a stone church. The foundation was completed, but the convent was never built. His unexpected death in 1784 prevented the church from being completed. The foundation of the church was sealed and continued to act as a shelter. In 1788, the missionaries built a permanent wooden house, the Iglesia del Santuario de la Santa Madre del Buen Viaje, and the Sacred Heart Convent. In 1841, it was abandoned and fell into disrepair. In the year 1873, it was taken over by the Mexican War veterans. In 1876, the soldiers abandoned the Old Mission to the Mexicans and left with 18 carts loaded with supplies. They proceeded northeast until they reached the Diablo Ridge. They found a site upon which they built a white rock convent. Their village was called White Rock. In time, many families moved to White Rock. In 1876, one of the churches of Mission San Antonio de Padua de La Presa was built, and a bell tower was attached to it. In 1878, a rail line was constructed to San Bruno. Many families moved to the White Rock town to work in the canneries of San Francisco. The buildings were constructed of adobe, and the owners occupied it for only a brief time. In 1879, the area was included in San Mateo County. In 1880, waterworks were constructed in White Rock. In 1886, a second railroad line was constructed to serve the Port of San Francisco. In 1888, the first house was constructed in White Rock. In 1911, the rail line

Improve this Doc Setting up a Grid The GridLayout provides an easy to use implementation for specifying rows and columns to use for formatting content as a grid. Creating a Grid for your application allows you to define one or more  elements that define a grid of columns and rows that will be used to display content in your application. You can use the GridLayout to create any layout you want. For example, a GridLayout can easily be set up to mimic a two column two row layout for a dynamic content area:     <header>...</header> <section>...</section>   <section>...</section>  <div class=&qu
